CES Call for Open Forum Working Papers

Dear Colleagues,

Now that we’re well along into the Spring semester, we want to remind the CES community, and especially the visiting scholars, about the Open Forum, the CES working papers series. Open Forum’s goal is both to bring new work on Europe to a wide audience and to facilitate discussion of the papers among authors and readers. We urge all of you to consider submitting papers on work in progress and to go to the website to read and comment on the papers already there.

You can currently post comments by going to "publications" on the CES website and clicking on the "Join the Discussion" link on the abstract page for each paper that is linked to its title in the list of Open Forum papers. This will bring you to the paper on Scribd, an interactive website that enables discussion by readers and authors. After scrolling to the end of the paper on Scribd you can click on a "review" option to open a box into which comments can be written and then posted at a link below the lower right of the box. The discussion will be easier in the forthcoming version of the CES website. Working papers prior to the Open Forum series are listed on the CES publications page from which they can be downloaded.

Those preparing papers for submission should comply with the requirements set forth in the style sheet. Properly formatted and proofread papers should be sent to either of the co-editors, Grzegorz Ekiert or Andrew Martin. Once a paper is submitted, it is sent to a scholar with relevant expertise for a double-blind review.

We hope you will consider submitting a paper to the Open Forum and look over the papers already in it. If you have any questions about these procedures or any other aspect of the papers please don't hesitate to ask either of us.

Sincerely,
Grzegorz Ekiert & Andrew Martin
Editors, CES Open Forum Working Paper Series
